H. A. GADE

GADE

Gade is among the few artists whose talent reflects the spirit of the times. I first saw his works in 1946. Even at that early stage his works commanded the attention of critics and connoisseurs, and the impression was all the greater; as having to work otherwise for his living, he could devote to painting only as much time and attention as he could spare. Soon after, however, his devotion to art compelled him to embrace the profession of a painter, with all its hazards and ecstasies.

His early works were already marked by a high degree of technical accomplishment and were, broadly speaking, naturalistic. But his keen sensitiveness to the beauty of nature stimulated his vision beyond his visual experience and instilled in his style a profound creative feeling—a quality which has progressively marked his works during the last decade, both in form and colour.

Gade's temperament has always been charged with a restless perseverance, tempered with healthy intellectual judgment. This is the secret of his success: and the virility of his mind is full of great potentialities.
